International Claims: Postwar French Practice

Burns H. Weston

"The international legal order is today constituted, as in the past, mainly on a horizontal basis. . . . The nation-state remains the primary repository of international legal authority and control, with most effective decisions being taken on a government-to-government plane. . . . Placed side by side, these decisions, from country to country, help form over time that synthesis which is in large measure what we today call international law. This study is intended as a modest contribution towards that synthesis."—from the Introduction

This study examines the practice of eight French claims commissions established by the French government since World War II to distribute lump sums transferred to France by Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Rumania, the United Arab Republic (Egypt) and most recently Cuba, for the purpose of compensating mainly French property interests affected by measures taken in those countries. It seeks to clarify the combined diplomatic-arbitral decisions that are explicitly embodied in the rulings of these commissions.

It is a major contribution to the continuing examination of national practices in the international claims field undertaken in this distinguished series. The United States Foreign Claims Settlement Commission and the British Foreign Compensation Commission have been examined previously.

POLITICS AND THE INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM: An Introduction By Keith R. Legg and James F. Morrison, University of Florida

A core book for a course using a number of paperbacks, this general introduction with extensive chapter bibliographies provides a wide range of suggested readings. Comparative in approach, it relates the study of politics at many different levels, emphasizing the general concept of "systems" and the application of conflict theory to the study of international politics. Using specific situations to clarify and define relationships, the authors develop a framework for a viable theory of international politics. They start with the development and interaction of social systems and the causes of resulting conflicts and go on to examine the relationships among domestic needs, state capacities, and external (system) constraints in determining foreign policies. In their treatment of various international systems, the authors discuss the factors that determine what kind of system institutions and norms develop and what types of international conflict and modes of resolution emerge. The final chapter breaks new ground in considering sources of change in international systems and analyzing reasons for the substantial transformation of contemporary international systems.
