

Men and Decisions

Lewis L. Strauss. Doubleday. 468 pp. $6.95.

The former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission reviews a long and stormy career in government service and comments extensively on such matters as government security, nuclear testing, and other "areas of decision" in which he has been intimately involved.

The New Frontier of War

William R. Kintner and Joseph Z. Kornfeder. Regnery. 362 pp. $7.50.

If we are to prevail in the war with communism, the authors write, we must fight with the same weapons employed by the communists—the weapons of political warfare, which seeks to weaken and disarm the enemy primarily through non-military means.

Christ and Crisis

Charles Malik. Eerdmans. 101 pp. $3.

In a series of religious meditations, a former President of the U. N. General Assembly considers the personal Christian response to the communist threat, the crisis in Western values, the demands of rising nations, and the technological revolution.

Modern Guerrilla Warfare

Franklin Mark Osanka, Ed. The Free Press of Glencoe. 519 pp. $7.50.

A selection of writings covering the scope of guerrilla warfare in the last twenty years, this volume concentrates on the communist guerrilla movement as it has developed in various parts of the world, and the problems it poses for an American counterstrategy.

Economic Development in Perspective

John Kenneth Galbraith. Harvard. 76 pp. $2.50.

The noted economist and Ambassador to India rejects the theory that there can be a common prescription for economic progress in the underdeveloped countries. Rather, he writes, "the need is for a plan appropriate to the particular stage in each country."

East Central Europe and the World

Stephen D. Kertesz, Ed. Notre Dame. 386 pp. $6.50.

Communist rule in the captive nations and its adjustment to the pressures of the post-Stalin era are examined in this collection of fourteen essays by noted analysts of international relations.
