Russian Philosophy

James M. Edie, James P. Scanlan, and Mary-Barbara Zeldin, editors, with the collaboration of George L. Kline

In Three Volumes:

- Vol. I: The Beginnings of Russian Philosophy;
The Slavophiles; The Westernizers
- Vol. II: The Nihilists; The Populists; Critics of Religion and Culture
- Vol. III: Pre-Revolutionary Philosophy and Theology; Philosophers in Exile; Marxists and Communists

These are landmark volumes: the first historical anthology of Russian philosophical thought from its origin to the present day, with critical and interpretive commentary. In preparation for more than four years under the direction of four philosophical scholars, the work includes sixty-eight selections from twenty-seven philosophers. Most of the selections have been translated into English for the first time, or retranslated especially for these volumes. The development of Russian philosophy through its various schools and "isms" is traced in the general introductions to each of the nine parts of the volumes. Detailed discussion of individual thinkers and pertinent selected bibliographies are found in special introductions which precede selections from their work. The volumes are fully and comprehensively indexed.

Although these books will be invaluable for the student of Russian philosophy and intellectual history, there is almost nothing in Russian philosophical writing so technical as to be beyond the grasp of the general reader with an interest in Russian culture. Russian speculation has always been decidedly man-centered. From the beginnings of philosophy in the 17th and 18th centuries, and into the post-Revolutionary emigration, certain themes have remained constant: the problem of good and evil in individual and social life, the meaning of individual existence, the nature of history. Furthermore, Russian philosophical thought has been uniquely non-academic and non-institutional. Major Russian thinkers—until the 20th century—were in a large sense "critics." Their thought, as set forth in these magnificent volumes, is a major publishing event.

Vol. I: 456 PAGES / $7.50 Vol. II: 336 PAGES / $6.50

Vol. III: 544 PAGES / $8.50
