International Law and the Use of Force by States

Ian Brownlie

This important book, essential to international lawyers and international relations specialists, has been out of print since 1979 and is now reissued. 'There is no question . . . but that this book will be generally regarded as indispensable to any library of repute and will become a standard work of reference.' International and Comparative Law Quarterly. £35

Documents on the Laws of War

Edited by Adam Roberts and Richard Guelff

This book contains the texts of twenty-five formal international agreements, from the 1856 Paris Declaration to the 1981 UN Weapons Convention. It also contains other important documents, such as the 1978 Red Cross Fundamental Rules of International Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflicts. Each document is preceded by notes explaining the legal and historical context, and each binding international agreement is followed by a complete list of all the states which are parties to it. £18.50 paperback £10.95

Promises, Morals, and Law

P.S. Atiyah

This book attempts an analysis of the nature of promissory obligations. In the first part, the author examines theories of promising associated with Natural Lawyers, the utilitarians, and a number of linguistic philosophers. All these he rejects as unsound. His own theory of promissory obligation offered in the last part of the book closely parallels theories of contractual obligation which he has developed in other works. £14

The Contribution of the Courts to Government

A West African View

A.N.E. Amisshah

This book is a personal appreciation of the contribution of the courts to the governance of a state, with particular reference to the courts of anglophone Africa. It concludes with suggestions on how the courts may be constituted and approach their work with the minimum of friction and in promotion of the public good. £22.50
