CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Anglo-Saxon England 49

Contributions to the forty-ninth volume of Anglo-Saxon England focus on aspects of Anglo-Saxon culture and history across a period from the sixth to the thirteenth century. This volume begins with a Record of the nineteenth conference of the International Society of Anglo-Saxonists, and ends with examination of Slave resistance in early Medieval England. Be wifmannes beweddunge is used to discuss the Anglo-Saxon betrothal and wedding process, and the gradual Christianisation of wedding rites throughout the period. Two companion articles re-evaluate commonly held beliefs about elite diets, using isotopic evidence to counter previous assumptions about the feorm or 'food rent' sent by free peasants to royal households. Also included are an examination of a recently discovered fragment of the abridged version of Cassiodorus's Expositio psalmorum, a reassessment of the importance of bookland in understanding the period, and an investigation into conflicting East Anglian episcopal chronology, with regard to Bede's Historia Ecclesiastica.

Editorial note

Professor Clare Orchard

The present volume marks a significant changing of the guard. After volume 48 went to press, Clare Orchard stood down as copyeditor. She has served the journal with great care, kindness and courtesy for 26 years, ensuring smooth continuity across successive configurations of executive editors and acting as the calmly efficient interface between contributors and the Press. Her knowledge of the field proved invaluable, and her services extended well beyond copy-editing, to keeping executive editors on track with bringing volumes together. The current editors wish to put on record their profound gratitude to her for all that she has done.

We are delighted to welcome Joanne Shortt Butler as her successor.
