psychological and emotional force. The recovery of a charter text results from an expert reconstruction of the contents of the cartulary of the Dorset abbey of Abbotsbury based on accounts written before this archive was lost during the civil wars of the seventeenth century. A surprisingly small number of Scandinavian place-names in Rutland is taken to be evidence that this region succeeded in retaining its English identity throughout the period of Scandinavian settlement. The survey of the five principal towns of the southern Danelaw satisfactorily complements the large amount of attention paid in recent years to Viking York.

In accordance with standard practice in all past issues the volume concludes with a comprehensive bibliography of contributions published in all branches of Anglo-Saxon studies during 1988.

The contributors are ANN W. ASTELL, STEVEN BASSETT, CARL E. BERKHOUT, MARTIN BIDDLE, MARK BLACKBURN, MICHELLE P. BROWN, BARRIE COX, SARAH FOOT, MILTON MCC. GAICHL, R.A. HALL, K.D. HARTZELL, SIMON KEYNES and A.R. RUMBLE.

Anglo-Saxon England
Volume 18

From reviews of previous volumes:

'Anglo-Saxon England continues its magisterial course, for it has long since become the premier journal in Anglo-Saxon studies ... Literary scholars have been for too long trapped within rather a narrow area of Anglo-Saxon studies, and the volumes of Anglo-Saxon England help to redress the balance.'

Modern Language Review

'The strength of the series lies in its scope, identification and rigidly disciplined investigation of any facts, events or persons associated with England not only before the conquest but also with the vigorous subsequent tradition. Disciplinary lines are crossed, but always in the firmly anchored policy of relevance to Anglo-Saxon culture.'

American Notes and Queries

'This annual series is now well established as a place of publication for papers on all aspects of Anglo-Saxon England, conveniently bringing together studies on history, literature, art and architecture ... those of purely historical and archaeological interest have been of high quality ...'

Bulletin of the Institute of Archaeology

'There is no doubt that Anglo-Saxon England, in the main, stimulates by offering new information or by presenting speculative argument which causes reaction, and that it has contributed greatly in recent years to the health of Anglo-Saxon studies.'
