

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

CELESTA A. ALBONETTI is an Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign. Her current research interests are in criminal case processing and perceptions of crime causation. Recently, she has coauthored articles in the American Sociological Review and American Journal of Sociology.

KATHLEEN DALY is an Assistant Professor of Sociology at Yale University. Her theoretical interests are on the intersection of feminist, legal, and sociological theory. She is currently engaged in several research projects, including a study of gender and conceptions of justice in a New Haven criminal court, collaborative efforts of lawyers and social scientists in prison litigation, and gender differences in white collar crime.

JAMES P. FOLEY is a Research Assistant at the Automotive Transportation Center at Purdue University. His research interest is in human factors and highway safety with special emphasis on drunk driving.

CHARLES A. JOHNSON is a Professor of Political Science at Texas A&M University. His research interests include the impact of judicial decisions and judicial behavior. He has written several articles on the reactions of judges and administrative agencies to judicial decisions. He has also coauthored a book with Bradley Canon entitled Judicial Policies: Implementation and Impact (Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly, 1984).

HERBERT M. KRITZER is a Professor of Political Science at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. He is the senior author of many papers to grow out of the Civil Litigation Research Project and currently is completing two book manuscripts drawing upon the extensive data collected by that project. Over the next several years he expects to be working on a cross-national study of the ways in which individuals use the courts to handle day-to-day problems.

STEWART MACAULAY is the Malcolm Pitman Sharp Professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. He currently is president of the Law and Society Association, and was Co-Associate Editor of the Law & Society Review from 1978 to 1981. He is the coauthor of Law and the Behavioral Sciences (Michie, 1977), and has written numerous articles about business practices related to the law of contracts, lawyers, and other topics in the field. His "Law and the Behavioral Sciences: Is There Any There There?" looked at the past and future of the field and was published in the Law & Policy Quarterly.

SETSUO MIYAZAWA is a Professor of Law at Kobe University, Japan. He received his LL.B. and LL.M. from Hokkaido University, Japan, his Ph.D. in sociology from Yale, and was a visiting fellow at Harvard Law School. He has published in Japanese books on the attitudes and behavior of Japanese police detectives, which was the first observational study of Japanese police conducted by a Japanese scholar. He has also published books on the development and structure of legal departments in Japanese corporations. He is presently directing a three-year project on civil disputing that covers both individual and organizational parties.

JOEL ROSCH is an Assistant Professor of Political Science at North Carolina State University. He received his Ph.D. from the University of Washington. His current research focuses on the development of alternatives to litigation and on the impact of litigation on criminal justice policy.

H. LAURENCE ROSS is a Professor of Sociology at the University of New Mexico. His principal research interest is in the capabilities and limitations of law as a tool of social policy, and he has frequently addressed this issue in the context of deterrence-based drunk-driving laws. His recent book, Deterring the Drinking Driver: Legal Policy and Social Control, surveys the international literature on the topic. He is currently a Fulbright Lecturer at the University of Helsinki, Finland.
