THE COMPETITIVE ADVANTAGE OF NATIONS

Michael E. Porter

In a work destined to become the standard reference on global competitiveness, Michael Porter explains the factors that determine the success of nations and their firms in international competition. He examines the importance of "clustering," where groups of successful firms and industries emerge in one country to gain leading market positions. Among the over 100 industries in ten nations studied, Porter examines German chemical and printing industries, Swiss textile equipment and pharmaceuticals, Italian fabric and home appliances, and American software and movies. He breaks new ground in the economic analysis of global markets, and outlines how any company can tap its nation's advantages in international competition.

Do governments seeking to collaborate in such organizations as the United Nations and the World Bank ever learn to improve the performance of those organizations!

Is much of the First World's dissatisfaction with the United Nations due to the organization's failure to learn?

Can international organizations be improved by a deliberate institutional design that reflects lessons learned in peace-keeping, human rights and the environment?

FUTURES

The journal of forecasting and planning

Managing editor: Colin Blackman

Futures is generally recognized as the world's leading journal covering forecasting, planning and futures studies. Key debates about the medium to long-term future – such as limits to growth, sustainable development, the nature of scientific and technological change, economic long waves and human frontiers – have all been conducted within the pages of Futures.

The editorial policy of the journal is a forward-looking one, alerting industrialists, politicians and government officials to the important emerging issues – yet it is not afraid to admit that thinking about and envisioning the future is a centuries-old activity that may be imprecise. Articles in the journal come from a broad range of disciplines which segment a wide range of more traditional subject areas.

In today's complex and uncertain environments (political, economic, social, cultural, scientific and technological), Futures aims to provide an authoritative guide and early warning system, keeping readers in touch with leading-edge research and providing information on the major trends. Published bi-monthly, Futures carries primary research papers, prospective and comment articles, book reviews, news and reports.

Its broad international readership is drawn from government, business management, industrial R & D, operational research, corporate planners, issues analysts, public affairs specialists, political, economic and social sciences, defence studies and international relations, policy/decision making sciences, and futures studies.
