OF BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

VOLUME XLVII NUMBER 2

SUMMER 1973

Editor's Note

Since 1962, the Review has occasionally published special issues summarizing progress in heavily researched fields or exploring new subjects or areas too long neglected by business and economic historians. By definition, these issues involve extraordinary planning, selection, and presentation arrangements; and, by definition, they cannot be regularly produced on demand. Nevertheless, we remain convinced that reasonably periodic special issues are useful synthesizing and focusing devices. The favorable receptions given our issues on fashion (1963), American government-business relations (1964), international government-business relations (1964), transportation (1965), Latin America (1965), and Japan (1970) have been gratifying and have sustained us in our view.

With considerable pride, we present this special issue on Canadian business and economic history. The Canadian experience has not yet, perhaps, received the amount of attention it merits from non-specialists. We believe that this assortment of articles demonstrates that current scholarship in that field is flourishing, and we hope that the appearance of this special issue may help to encourage still more interest in business history in Canada. We extend special thanks to the consulting editor for this issue, Robert D. Cuff, whose labors made the issue possible.
