The paranoid delusional psychosis are generally chronic, of varying severity, arranged in a particular structure and previous personality. They are credible, plausible, logical delusions. They are polymorphic, absurd and improbable.

Kraepelin states that: 'The paranoia is an insidious development of a delusional, permanent and unchanging system resulting from internal causes, accompanied by the perfect preservation and clarity of thought, will and activity.'

Schneider adds: 'The rest of the personality shown consistent for a long time and these individuals may continue to operate in their daily lives' The delusional system tends to perpetuate itself over time even remissions arising during the course.

Clérambault described in paranoid psychosis delirium claim, among which includes the passionate idealist, altruistic with dye. Passionate Idealists have a combative form of delirium, the subject can be both religious and political. For them, the end justifies the means, which always makes them dangerous. His ideological fanaticism can not handle criticism and leads them to commit against the prevailing social norm.
