ERRATA INSERT SHEET

(Vol. XV, No. 2, p. 217)

Due to a technical problem during the final printing stage of the last issue, subscribers of the journal should take note of the following correction in Gregory D. Knight's article "The Nationality Question in Contemporary Hungarian-Romanian Relations." On page 217, the paragraph beginning "In acquiescing to Soviet demands..." should read as follows:*

In acquiescing to Soviet demands for unity under communist rule, the new Romanian government sought to address the needs of its national minorities. As Romania's largest minority, the Transylvanian Magyars received considerable attention during this period. In 1945, the Hungarian Bolyai University in Cluj was reopened; Magyar students at the University were to receive their instruction in their native language. During the same year, Radio Bucharest began to transmit broadcasts in the Magyar language. In 1948, the Constitution of the People's Republic guaranteed freedom to use one's own language and also permitted the organization of educational institutions in the mother tongues of the "cohabitating nationalities." In 1952, a Magyar Autonomous Region was established along the Soviet model for territorial organization, providing considerable liberties for about one-third of Romania's Magyar minority. Thus, in the immediate aftermath of the Stalinist Gleichschaltung in Eastern Europe, Romania adopted a relatively tolerant stance toward its Hungarian minority.<sup>3</sup>
