

About the Authors

Robert J. Boeckmann is Assistant Professor of Psychology at Flinders University in Adelaide, Australia. His research examines the psychology of retributive justice. In particular, he is concerned with the influence of the nature of the crime committed on the type and magnitude of public responses. He is a co-author of Social Justice in a Diverse Society (with Tom R. Tyler, Heather Smith, and Yuen Huo; Westview, 1997).

Ruth Buchanan has recently become an Assistant Professor at the Faculty of Law, University of British Columbia, after spending three years as an Assistant Professor at the University of New Brunswick. She is also completing work on an S.J.D. degree from the University of Wisconsin, Madison. Her dissertation considers the convergent processes of regulatory restructuring and discursive reconstruction of the "local" in the context of globalization through a case study of the emerging telemarketing and teleservice industry in the province of New Brunswick.

Kriss A. Drass is an Associate Professor in the Department of Criminal Justice, University of Las Vegas, Nevada. His areas of interest include criminology, sociology of law, and research methods and statistics. His current work focuses on the use of crime event analysis to develop typologies of homicides.

Peter Gregware is an Associate Professor of Criminal Justice at New Mexico State University. He has written on legal decisionmaking, juvenile justice, and cultural analysis of law. His current research interests include the function of self-identity in legal interventions and the role of law in disease scares.

Fiona M. Kay is Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of British Columbia. Her research interests include gender stratification in the legal profession, mobility ladders and salary differentials across careers, and life course transitions and criminal involvement. Together with John Hagan she is co-author of Gender in Practice: A Study of Lawyers' Lives (Oxford University Press, 1995). Current research involves a comparative study of lawyers in civil and common law jurisdictions, focusing on the progress of women and visible minorities within the profession (with John Hagan) and a longitudinal study of juvenile offenders, focusing on patterns of recidivism and police contact (with Bruce Arnold).

Michael Musheno is Professor of Justice Studies and Public Affairs and Director of the Center for Urban Studies at Arizona State University. He is a member of the Editorial Board of Law & Society Review and a past director of the Law and Social Sciences Program of the National Science Foundation. One strand of his current research focuses on the nonviolent conflict management practices of inner-city youths, including gang members, and is intended to challenge the dominant construction of black and Latino youths as violent predators. A second strand of inquiry draws on organizational stories to explore the politics of identity employed by urban workers who provide social services to marginalized clients. Reports on his completed work on the sociolegal dynamics of HIV appear in Law and Social Inquiry, Law & Policy, and Law & Society Review.

Susan S. Silbey is Professor of Sociology at Wellesley College. She was President of the Law and Society Association during 1995–96 and is the Editor-Elect of Law & Society Review. She has written about consumer protection, alternative dispute resolution, and cultural analyses of law.

Tom R. Tyler is Professor of Psychology at the University of California, Berkeley. His research has been concerned with the psychology underlying people's responses to the decisions made by third parties such as judges and police officers. His books include The Social Psychology of Procedural Justice (with E. Allan Lind; Plenum, 1988), Why People Obey the Law (Yale, 1990), Trust in Organizations (with Rod Kramer; Sage Publications, 1996), and Social Justice in a Diverse Society (with Robert Boeckmann, Heather Smith, and Yuen Huo; Westview, 1997).

Jerry Van Hoy is Assistant Professor of Sociology at Purdue University. He is the author of Franchise Law Firms and the Transformation of Personal Legal Services (Quorum Books, 1997). His research interests include the work practices of personal services lawyers and the operation of homeowners' associations. He is currently studying the practices of plaintiff's personal injury attorneys in Indiana.

David J. Walsh has been on the faculty of the Management Department at Miami University (Ohio) since 1991. His research and teaching are in the areas of labor relations and employment law. He is the author of On Different Planes (ILR Press, 1994), a study of airline unions. With colleague Joshua Schwarz, he has been studying legal protections against wrongful discharge.