About the Authors

Bryant Garth is Director of the American Bar Foundation. Prior to coming to ABF in 1990, he was Dean of the Indiana University School of Law–Bloomington. He recently published, with Yves Dezalay, Dealing in Virtue: International Commercial Arbitration and the Construction of a Transnational Legal Order (1996), and they are now finishing another book, this time focusing on Latin America, human rights, and the debt crisis, tentatively entitled Global Palace Wars: Imperialist and Professional Strategies within the field of State Power. As a continuation of the same general project, they have also begun to do research in Asia, commencing in Korea. Garth is also co-editor (with Austin Sarat) of two of the Law and Society Summer Institute volumes. The first, Justice and Power in Socio-legal Studies, was published by Northwestern University Press in 1998. The second on How Does Law Matter? will be published later this year.

Peter Goodrich is Corporation of London Professor of Law, University of London, Birkbeck College. His current research is on the history of women's courts and judgments of love. His most recent books are Oedipus Lex: Psychoanalysis, History, Law (University of California Press) and Law in the Courts of Love: Literature and Other Minor Jurisprudences (Routledge).

Harmon M. Hosch is Professor of Psychology and Associate Dean of the College of Liberal Arts at the University of Texas at El Paso. His primary research program focuses on jury decisionmaking. He recently completed a two-year term as a Visiting Scientist at the National Science Foundation. In that capacity, he served as Director of the Law and Social Science Program.

David T. Johnson is Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Hawaii at Manoa. In addition to his research on prosecuting street crime in Japan, he is working on a comparative project about the prosecution of political corruption in Japan, the United States, and South Korea.

Candace Kruttschnitt is a Professor in the Department of Sociology at the University of Minnesota. She has published extensively on the subject of female offenders, including both reviews of research pertaining to gender differences in etiology and primary analysis of criminal court sentencing. Most recently, she has undertaken a study (funded by the National Science Foundation) that seeks to replicate and extend Ward and Kassebaum's research on women's adaptations to incarceration. The research will examine both temporal and institutional variations in women's prison experiences in California over a 30-year period.

K. Kuperan is associate professor of natural resource economics at the Universiti Putra Malaysia where he has taught for 15 years. The article by him and Jon Sutinen is based on from his 1992 Ph.D. dissertation (University of Rhode Island), a study of compliance with zoning regulations in Malaysian fisheries. He is currently conducting research on fisheries compliance and enforcement in Indonesia, Malaysia, and the Philippines for the International Center for Living Aquatic Resource Management (Manila).

Alfonso Morales is Assistant Professor of Sociology and Anthropology at the University of Texas at El Paso. He is interested in elaborating the possibilities and limits of pragmatist-inspired social theory and method. He has written about the organization of street vending; about vendors and tax evasion; about commercial radio and the informal economy. He is co-editing a book on street vendors around the world and writing a book about vendors at Chicago's Maxwell Street Market. His street vendors web page is www.openair.org.

Matthew W. Oliveri is a student at the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, VA. He is majoring in political science and expects to pursue a career in government. The research reported in this issue was conducted while he served as a summer intern with the Law and Social Science Program of the National Science Foundation.

Howard Schweber received his J.D. degree from the University of Washington in 1989 and practiced law for four years in San Francisco as an associate in the Litigation Department at Graham & James. In 1993 he returned to graduate school, receiving an M.A. in History from the University of Chicago in 1994. He is currently a doctoral candidate in the Department of Government at Cornell University.

Joyce Sterling is Professor of Law at University of Denver College of Law. She received her Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Denver. She served as Executive Officer for the Law and Society Association from 1984 to 1987. Her current sociolegal work deals with the careers and compensation of lawyers, focusing on gender disparities.

Jon G. Sutinen is Professor of Environmental and Natural Resource Economics at the University of Rhode Island. He has studied fisheries compliance and enforcement problems for more than 15 years, has written extensively on the subject, and has been a consultant to fisheries management and enforcement agencies in the United States, Europe, New Zealand, and Australia. He spent 6 months of his 1996 sabbatical studying and writing on fishery compliance issues at the

New Zealand Ministry of Fisheries and the Australian Fishery Management Authority. Dr. Sutinen was selected by the OECD Committee for Fisheries to chair its Workshop on Enforcement in 1993 and to write one of the three volumes of its just-released study of fishery management in OECD Member Countries. Sutinen and Kuperan are authors of "A Socioeconomic Theory of Regulatory Compliance in Fisheries," forthcoming in the International Journal of Social Economics.

Christopher Uggen is an Assistant Professor in the Department of Sociology at the University of Minnesota. His research examines the process of desistance from deviant roles, the relation between pro-social and antisocial behavior, and the use of law within organizations. He is currently investigating within-person changes in crime, drug use, and employment in a study funded by the National Institute of Justice.
