ABOUT THE CONTRIBUTORS

Duncan Clarke was formerly a lecturer in Economics at the University of Rhodesia. His principal research is involved with underdevelopment, income distribution, and labor in Southern Africa. His most recent work is Contract Workers and Underdevelopment in Rhodesia. (Gwelo: Mambo Press, 1974).

E. Phillip LeVeen is an assistant professor of Agricultural and Resource Economics at the University of California, Berkeley. This work is an expansion of a section of his unpublished dissertation entitled "British Slave Trade Suppression Policies, 1821-1865: Impact and Implications"; a second related article, "A Quantitative Analysis of the Impact of British Suppression Policies on the Volume of the Nineteenth Century Atlantic Slave Trade," has recently been published in Race and Slavery in the Western Hemisphere, ed. Stanley Engerman and Eugene Genovese (Princeton University Press, 1974).

Carol M. Eastman is an associate professor of Anthropology and an adjunct associate professor of Linguistics at the University of Washington. Her regional specialty is Coastal Swahili language and culture and her most recent publication is Aspects of Language and Culture: Linguistics in an Anthropological Context (Chandler and Sharp, 1975).

Thomas R. Knipp is a professor of English and Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at St. Louis University. A specialist in African Literature, he has taught in Ethiopia on several occasions, most recently as a Fulbright lecturer from 1968 to 1970. His most recent publication is "Negritude and Negation: The Poetry of Tchikanga U'Tamsi" (Books Abroad, August 1974).

Stephen P. Heyneman is a senior scientist with the Social Research Group at George Washington University. He recently completed his doctoral dissertation, entitled "Influences on Academic Achievement in Uganda: A 'Coleman Report' from a Non-Industrialized Society," in Comparative Education at the University of Chicago.

James A. McCain is an assistant professor in the African and Afro-American Studies Department, State University College, Brockport, New York. In addition to ideology in Africa, his research interests include content analysis of the work of African leaders and methodologies used in African studies.

Frank A. Salamone, who formerly taught at State University College, Brockport, New York, is presently an assistant professor of Anthropology in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology, St. John's University. His research interests include social welfare work in Northern Nigeria and the forced migration following the building of Kainji Dam, Nigeria.

Kenneth L. Adelman, a doctoral candidate in Political Theory at Georgetown University, is a former government employee with the Office of Economic Opportunity and was a member of a Presidential Council studying poverty programs in the United States. In 1972, he moved to Kinshasa, Zaire, where he has been conducting research on Zairian religions, politics, and art. He is a frequent contributor to political science and art publications dealing with Africa.

Laurie S. Wiseberg is an assistant professor in the Department of Political Science, University of Illinois, Chicago Circle. Her publications include an article on "Humanitarian Intervention Lessons from the Nigerian Civil War," in the Journal of Human Rights, and a chapter entitled "International Perspectives on the African Famine" in a forthcoming book edited by Michael Glantz, to be published by Praeger Publishers.
