COVER: A MEXICAN WELL BLOWS IN. Spewing crude oil at the rate of 100,000 barrels per day, Potrero del Llano No. 4 defied the efforts of workmen to cap it for more than a month. The single well, for a time the most productive in the world, made Weetman Pearson's British company, El Aguila, the largest foreign oil concern in Mexico. CONTRIBUTORS

JONATHAN C. BROWN, an associate professor of history at the University of Texas, Austin, is engaged in researching and writing a history of the foreign oil companies in Mexico. His previous articles on the subject have appeared in the American Historical Review, Multinational Enterprise in Historical Perspective (1986), edited by Alice Teichova, et al., and Latin American Oil Companies and the Politics of Energy (1985), edited by John Wirth. He has also studied Latin American labor and the economic and social history of Argentina.

WILFRIED FELDENKIRCHEN of the Federal Republic of Germany is professor of economic and social history at the University of Bonn. In addition to several publications on German economic and social history in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, he has also written widely on the growth, structure, financing, and organization of German industry.

PETER HAYES is associate professor of history at Northwestern University. He received his Ph.D. in modern German history in 1982 from Yale University. He has written numerous reviews and articles on business and politics in Germany during the first half of the twentieth century, as well as Industry and Ideology: IG Farben in the Nazi Era (1987). He is currently at work on an extended study of the transformation of German big business since 1890.

DONALD R. STABILE is associate professor of economics at St. Mary's College of Maryland. He is the author of Prophets of Order (1984) and of several articles dealing with the ideas of Thorstein Veblen. His article on the Du Pont experiments with scientific management grew out of research begun in a seminar on "Engineers in Conflict," part of the National Endowment for the Humanities program of Summer Seminars for College Teachers.
