

WHY DOES GOD PERMIT EVIL? By Dom Bruno Webb, O.S.B.
(Burns Oates; paper 2s., cloth 3s. 6d.)

At a time when the meaning of evil is questioned even more than usual, this book presents a sincerely thought-out statement of the Christian answer. It is indeed so far from being content with the bare minimum of such a statement that a considerable part of it attempts what is to us a new effort to justify the suffering of the brute creation. This attempt is most certainly ingenious, but we think unnecessary. The author agrees with St. Thomas that the brutes were carnivorous before the fall of man, but unlike St. Thomas he thinks there was something wrong in that, and so has to find a cause for it in the fallen angels. There seems to be an idea latent in all this long argument that suffering of every kind is somehow 'wrong' and a kind of moral evil in itself. The rest of the book should be a great help to all its readers. The observation, however, that unbaptised children can suffer meritoriously—witness the Holy Innocents—does appear to indicate in the context that they normally do, which is not the traditional view.

FOLLOW ME. A Vindication of the Ideal of Religious Life. By Bernard Fennelly, C.S.Sp. Introduction by Edward Leen, C.S.Sp.
(Burns Oates; 6s.)

This is a splendid book in which Fr. Fennelly offers a most useful contribution to religious writing in English. It seems that the subtitle which is suggestive of a defensive controversy does not give a true impression of the real contents. The matter is only incidentally apologetic, but primarily expositive and doctrinal. The splendour of the religious ideal is unfolded in a scholarly and attractive manner, which is appealing for its own sake. In his valuable introduction Dr. Leen calls attention to the fundamental truths and principles underlying the religious state, which are woven into the main theme of the whole book. The vows are comprehensively studied in order from both the spiritual and canonical point of view. Our Lord and his Blessed Mother are set before the reader as the ideals of what the religious by profession must strive to become. The matter falls into three parts, under which in distinct sections the respective vow is considered and then its corresponding virtue. Many points which sometimes raise difficulties are clearly explained, particularly regarding obedience. A better account could hardly be found of what is meant by blind obedience, which is shown to be blind only in a qualified sense. Similarly, the sin of contempt is stated to be a holding as worthless either the Person of the Superior in his official capacity, or his precept in exercising his authority. The author also shows that interior murmuring against obedience is at least venially sinful. In speaking of chastity he makes the shrewd remark for the benefit of modern educationalists and others, that knowledge does not impart moral power.

The quotations from the sacred Canons are taken from the official translation of the Holy See. We would like to have seen an index, and also to have had references to the passages quoted from St. John of the Cross, St. Teresa, St. Ignatius, St. Catherine. There is one reference to the latter, but only in the French edition.

A deep debt of gratitude is due to the author for the invaluable instruction for those training or being trained in the ways of religious life, and indeed for all who would understand better the full implications of the Christian ideal. And many who have yet to make a choice of a state of life will be grateful for the enlightenment they will receive from reading this reliable text-book.

AMBROSE FARRELL, O.P.

WE THE REDEEMED. By Christopher Tatham. (Michael Joseph; 10s. 6d.)

The logic, the psychology and the theology in this book are sometimes a trifle hazy; amid much very sound and timely advice will be found recommendations which, without more qualifications than are actually offered, might in certain cases be found misleading and even dangerous. But the author disarms too close a scrutiny of his work by the assurance that 'it is not written with an eye to meticulous critics,' and still more by his manifest sincerity of purpose and the measure of his success in a difficult undertaking. His book should meet, even if it cannot wholly satisfy, a real need: the need of the contemporary masses, without fixed and firm dogmatic beliefs, for initiation into the elements of the interior life of a Christian. For many such, this kind of existential introduction to a living (if only embryonic) Christianity by way of elementary physiology and psychology will be worth many intellectual expositions and rational apologetics; and there is much in the volume which those more favoured might also ponder with profit.

PHILOSOPHY

GOD AND PHILOSOPHY. By Etienne Gilson. (Humphrey Milford; Yale University Press; 12s.)

Without hurry or overcrowding, and without recourse to technical jargon, the four lectures in this volume relate the story of the human reason's search for God from Thales to Julian Huxley. Inevitably much is left out which might be found somewhat to complicate the simplicity of the story; but also much more will be found than in any more voluminous 'history of philosophy.' For Professor Gilson's approach to the subject is not that of the mere historian; 'it consists,' to quote his own words, 'of extracting from the history of past philosophies the essential data that enter into the correct formulation of a problem, and of determining, in the light of such data, the correct solution.' Perhaps he has never before so convin-
