

who already are comfortably off without it, it has enormously increased their number, and in replacing slaves by machinery it has brought the good life within the reach of the masses.' 'Human progress depends on a double advance—increase in knowledge and the discovery of higher values . . . These values, of which goodness, truth and beauty are the chief, are transcendental, yet immanent in ordinary existence; far above man, yet within his reach . . . We may call them the vitamins of spiritual life . . . In science, the dominant vitamin is truth; in history, goodness and truth; in literature, beauty and goodness; in art, beauty.'

THE WORLD WE MEAN TO MAKE AND THE PART OF EDUCATION IN THE MAKING OF IT. By Maxwell Garnett. (Faber; 10s. 6d.)

The author of this book, like a certain illustrious essayist, appears 'utterly purposed not to offend.' In one gloriously inconsistent and courageous passage, indeed, he shows that the principles of the French revolution—now so much belauded—have not stood the test of time, while the United Kingdom and the United States owe their permanence to the strength of the Christian spirit behind them. But it is notable, even here, that he should adopt the pragmatic approach; elsewhere he is quite ready to accommodate principles to tactics. The world commonwealth of the future must be based on the Four Freedoms, but Russia must be accepted into the Commonwealth without being required to subscribe to these. He is very respectful to the psychologists and therefore puts forward only with reservations a view which presupposes the existence of free-will. Neither denying nor admitting the objective truth of Christianity, he endeavours to outline as a very convenient hypothesis the principles it has in common with other world religions. Mr. Garnett has gathered together a tremendous amount of information, with sources indicated in a great array of footnotes (of the phrase 'dreaming spires' we are not only told that it is from Arnold's poem, but also that Compton Mackenzie uses it as a title for the third section of his novel Sinister Street!), and it may seem captious to draw attention to these details. But the tragedy is that this book is an authentic expression of the mind of some of the noblest builders of a new world, who do not see that their plans can never be realised because they have never understood the meaning of truth.

WHAT IS EDUCATION? By Edward Leen, C.S.Sp. (Burns and Oates; 10s. 6d.)

'To the Christian, education is that culture of the mind, the will and the emotions, which, whilst adapting a man for the exercise of a particular calling, disposes him to achieve an excellent personal and social life within the framework of that calling.' This is the definition of education given by Dr. Edward Leen in his new book, and he
