

Indirect Rule and the Search for Justice

Essays in East African Legal History

H. F. Morris and James S. Read

These essays examine aspects of the search for justice which was a recurrent theme during the colonial period. They trace the development of official policies in East Africa, and the application of the doctrine of indirect rule during its heyday. This material, drawn largely from archival sources, illustrates the remarkably open debate within official circles at all levels as the colonial authorities sought to formulate just and practical policies within the framework of the doctrine. Although the main themes discussed are of a legal nature, the authors have endeavoured throughout to bridge the gap between history and law. £5.50 Oxford Studies in African Affairs

Land Policy in Buganda

HENRY W. WEST

An analysis of the land tenure system in the Buganda region of Uganda, its development and operation. One of the signs of social and economic change in Africa is the growth of individual property rights in land and the decay of various traditional systems of tenure. This book demonstrates the significance of changing land policy for Buganda and other land-based economies in tropical Africa.

The book will interest specialists in African studies, economic and social development, and systems of land tenure.

International Law and the New African States

by FELIX CHUKS OKOYE, LL.B., PH.D.

of Gray's Inn, Barrister

New nations have proliferated since the end of the second world war. Their participation in the international legal order, together with unprecedented developments in international organisations and technology have greatly circumscribed the frontiers of traditional international law and have focused attention on the evolution of a contemporary international law.

The newly emerged nations generate especial international interest as they have different legal, social, cultural, ethical and religious backgrounds from the established nations predominantly of western civilisation. The process by which they achieved independence, for instance, has fermented new problems in the laws of nationality and state succession. This book examines the process of this evolution primarily by reference to the role and attitudes of the African states towards certain aspects of traditional law and international organisations.

Part I discusses the evolution of the international personality of the African states. Part II deals with the relationship between African municipal law and international law. Part III contains a detailed account and legal analysis of the problems of state succession raised by decolonisation. Part IV covers the Organisation of African Unity and other developments in multinational co-operation, such as the African approach to the concepts of regionalism in international law. Part V deals with aspects of state responsibility, international co-operation, sources of law and the peaceful settlement of international disputes and contains an assessment of the impact which the African states have made on international law.
