

health. Notwithstanding his blindness, he continued to take great interest in Medical Psychology, and frequently contributed articles to Winslow's Psychological Journal. He had no difficulty in clothing his sentiments in flowing and elegant language. In his paper on Guiteau he advocated the view that he was insane. His articles on "Mad Poets" are pleasant reading.

DANIEL NOBLE, M.D., F.R.C.P.

Dr. Noble was at one time prominently before the public as a writer on Psychological Medicine and allied subjects. It is so long since he wrote any work that he is in danger of being forgotten. His "Elements of Psychological Medicine" possessed no small merit, though severely criticised by the late Professor Laycock in a medical periodical. In "The Brain and its Physiology," Dr. Noble entered into a minute defence of the phrenological system, and threw fresh life into it by his vigorous style and his able mode of handling it. The most striking and important contribution, however, was his "Mesmerism True—Mesmerism False," which appeared in Forbes's "British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review" in 1845, and was generally supposed to be from the editor's brilliant pen. At the present day it would probably not command particular attention, and would, it is likely, be thought to err on the side of scepticism; but forty years ago it was a bold, though discriminating, advocacy of what was really true in mesmerism, and was entirely free from indulging in the ignorant vulgar tirade against everything passing under the name, which at that period disgracefully characterised the treatment of the subject by the medical journals. In Dr. Noble, Sir John Forbes recognised one of his ablest and most intelligent contributors. Among his other works were "The Human Mind in its Relations with the Brain and Nervous System;" and "Influence of Manufactures upon Health and Life."

Dr. Noble died at Manchester January 12, aged 75.
