

just as outstanding. From his position at M.I.T. (1942-57) he moved to Yale University (1957-67) and then back to Harvard (1967-85). In 1977-87 he directed the International Institute for Comparative Political Research, Science Center Berlin. He presided over the American Political Science Association during the turbulent year 1969-70, and the International Political Science Association during years of expanding Third World membership and a world congress in Moscow (1976-79). Besides a half dozen honorary degrees, he received Germany's highest honor, Grand Cross of Merit.

Above all, Deutsch's students, his many scientific colleagues, and those who met him casually will doubtless remember best a sprightly mien and a brilliant mind tempered by a strong sense of humanity and fairness. He brought sparks to any lecture or private discussion: One had to work hard not to find something new and exciting. Moreover, he was eager to listen to any who had something interesting to tell him, to share his gifts with any who would pay heed. By the same token those insecure in their thoughts and excessively concerned about their status sometimes found him overwhelming. But those he touched personally or professionally—and they are legion not only in the United States but around the world—are glad that Karl came our way.

Richard L. Merritt
University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

Charles B. Hagan

Charles B. Hagan died on October 12, 1991 in Houston, Texas at the age of 87. He was a member and former chair of the department of political science at the University of Illinois from 1935 until his retirement in 1967. He then taught for eight years at the University of Houston.

Charles combined publications and service to the profession with an unflinching courtesy and commitment to standards of fairness in the education, hiring, and promotion of women and blacks long before that commitment was fashionable. As chair of the department of political science at the University of Illinois, he hired the first woman to ever teach in that department and lined up her first presentation at an APSA meeting (Betty Glad, one of the contributors to this memoir). He sought out black and minority graduate students and encouraged them; and he was unfailingly helpful to younger colleagues. On one occasion, he went looking at apartments with a graduate student from the Indian subcontinent. It was Charles' way of assuring the landladies of East Champaign that they could not turn the young man away on the basis of his color.

Another contributor to this memoir (Murray Edelman) was Charles' student before becoming his colleague, and like many others, remains his student still. In addition to subject matter, Charles' students learned that politics is a natural part of daily activity.

In addition to his years at Illinois and at the University of Houston, Charles Hagan taught at Emory and Henry College, Smith College, Harvard University, Duke University, and served in the U.S. Department of State. He received his Ph.D. from Duke University, was a Carnegie Fellow in International Law at Harvard University, and a Fulbright Fellow at the University of Sydney in Australia. Within the APSA, he served as a member of the Council, the Editorial Board of the APSR, and the Executive Committee, among others. His scholarship was wide ranging in the area of economic policy and legislative voting. Publications included Blueprint for Our Economic Democracy (co-written with Neil F. Garvey), three chapters in American Government and Economy by Emmette S. Redford, and the article "Geopolitics," which appeared in the Journal of Politics (November, 1942).

In the early 1950s he was a pioneer in the movement to establish the influence of Arthur Bentley and group theory in political science. Because of his efforts the University of Illinois became a leading center of that movement.

Together with Mulford Sibley, Charles established a lively chapter of the Socialist Party in Urbana in the late 1940s and even became its candidate for City Council, enjoying the campaign though he failed to gain office.

He married Dorothy Veinus, who had been his colleague at Smith College. She was a good friend of many of his colleagues, a witty conversationalist and an outstanding musicologist. Dorothy died in 1980.

Charles is survived by a daughter, Patricia Kuwayama, and a son, John Lee Hagan. Other survivors are his sister, Rozelle Hagey of Bristol, Tennessee, and four grandsons.

Betty Glad
University of South Carolina
Murray Edelman
University of Wisconsin-Madison

Thomas Ralph Solomon

Thomas Ralph Solomon, professor emeritus of political science at Prairie View A&M University, died on September 28, 1991 at the age of 87 in Houston, Texas. He was born March 18, 1904 in Macon, Georgia and attended private and public schools there, graduating as salutatorian from Ballard Normal High School on May 30, 1923.

He started his college education at Talladega College in Alabama where he remained until he married and moved to Detroit, Michigan. In Detroit he attended the City College of Detroit (now Wayne State University), receiving his A.B. in 1929 and his Masters degree in 1933. He continued his education at the University of Michigan while working full time as a postal clerk in the Detroit Post Office. Because of the way in which he combined graduate study and work he became a kind of folk hero. For example, The Detroit News, June 17, 1939, states "For two years Solomon has worked 5 days a week as a clerk in the Roosevelt Park Annex of the Detroit Post Office. He worked Saturdays and Sundays so he would be able to attend classes on Tuesdays and Thursdays. . . . Solomon was a porter in a downtown Detroit hotel when he decided to go back to college. . . . He worked four hours in the early afternoon as a substitute postal clerk. He also worked from 11 pm to 6 am in