

History of Education

History of Education is a half-yearly journal sponsored by the History of Education Society, which was founded in 1967 to promote the study of this subject in all its aspects. It contains original articles on the development of education both in Britain and abroad – schools and colleges, teaching methods, personalities, the politics of education and its philosophy. Some papers are illustrated with plates and drawings, and the journal is concluded with a section of book reviews. It is edited by Malcolm Seaborne, Principal of Chester College, in conjunction with an editorial board of distinguished scholars, including several corresponding members overseas.

IN HOC SIGNO? A Brief History of Catholic Parochial Education in America by Glen Gabert, Jr.

Have the Catholic schools been a success or a failure? Are they needed today? Can and should they survive? Now that the financial condition of the parochial schools has reached crisis proportions and various state aid proposals are being debated, searching questions about their role and function are being asked.

In Hoc Signo? is a study of the problems facing the Catholic schools in historical perspective. Drawing more heavily on official documents than authors of previous studies—papal writings and hierarchical statements—Glen Gabert is able to construct a revisionary interpretation of Catholic education in the U.S. that challenges the official history at many points.

BLACK STUDIES: Threat or Challenge? by Nick Aaron Ford

This monumental study by an eminent Black educator and humanist presents the first comprehensive, fully documented report on the history, scope, effects, and the future development of Black Studies programs in American schools and colleges.

"Its aim is to present, in language which a layman can understand, a professional evaluation of the past history, present practices, and future possibilities of Black Studies in the officially recognized educational programs of American colleges and universities . . ."—from the author's Preface
