
About the Authors

Benjamin Fleury-Steiner is Assistant Professor of Sociology and Criminal Justice at the University of Delaware. He has published numerous articles that explore the sociocultural roots of state-sanctioned death sentencing in such journals as the Cornell Law Review; Law & Society Review; Studies in Law, Politics, and Society; Criminal Justice Policy Review; and Homicide Studies. More recently, he has written an article investigating the identity politics of the “war on drugs” that was published in Studies in Law, Politics, and Society. His book Jurors’ Stories of Death: How America’s Death Penalty Invests in Inequality is forthcoming (2003) from the University of Michigan Press.

Susan W. Johnson is a Ph.D. student in Political Science at the University of South Carolina, where she is specializing in the study of public law. She has presented papers on the United States District Courts, the United States Courts of Appeals, and the Supreme Court of Canada at meetings of the American Political Science Association, the Midwest Political Science Association, and the Southern Political Science Association.

Annula Linders is Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Cincinnati. Her research interests are centered in the intersection of morality, culture, and politics, and include historical comparative work, primarily in Sweden and the United States, on social movements, social problems, and political processes. Her most recent work has been published in Social Problems and Deviant Behavior. She is also the Swedish member of a European research team funded by the European Commission to examine contentious politics around unemployment in six nations.

Nicole Leeper Piquero is an assistant professor in the Center for Studies in Criminology and Law at the University of Florida. Her research interests include corporate/white-collar crime and criminological theory. Her current research projects include an investigation into the possible influence of personality traits on the decision making process of individuals and an examination of gender differences in the context of General Strain Theory.

Nadera Shalhoub-Kevorkian, Ph.D., is a lecturer at the School of Social Work and the Institute of Criminology, Faculty of Law, Hebrew University, Jerusalem. She teaches theoretical courses for graduate students, courses related to women’s victimization and social policy, and clinical courses in social work practice, and she is involved in providing supervision and consultation to Arab social work students. Her research has focused on the study of the victimization of vulnerable groups in society, especially females, and has demonstrated that the victimization of women, and the social reaction to it, is better understood if analyzed within culturally and politically sensitive contexts. Shalhoub-Kevorkian has studied the efficacy of the existing Israeli Law Against Family Violence and formal and informal social control agents regarding the victimization of women in Israel and the areas under the control of the Palestinian Authority. Furthermore, she challenges common assumptions underlying criminological and victimological theories related to the abuse of women, asserting that feminist theories should be built on the voices of women whose voices have been muted for years (Child Abuse and Neglect, 1999). She has studied the crime of femicide and has also challenged the existing definition of femicide and has elaborated on the atrocities embedded within such a definition.

Sally S. Simpson is Professor of Criminology and Criminal Justice at the University of Maryland, College Park. She has a longstanding interest in corporate crime and is the author of numerous publications in this area, of which Corporate Crime, Law, and Social Control (Cambridge University Press, 2002) is her most recent. She is currently Principal Investigator on a large-scale study of corporate environmental compliance, funded by the National Institute of Justice.

Donald R. Songer is Professor of Political Science at the University of South Carolina. He is the co-author of Continuity and Change on the United States Courts of Appeals (University of Michigan Press, 2000) and has published articles in the area of law and courts in the American Political Science Review, American Journal of Political Science, Journal of Politics, Political Research Quarterly, Law & Society Review, and Judicature. With funding from the National Science Foundation, he also developed the multiuser United States Court of Appeals Database. He is currently one of the Principal Investigators for a major study funded by the National Science Foundation to produce the Comparative High Courts Database Project, which examines the decisions of the top appellate courts in ten nations for the period 1970–2003.
